The Trump administration has rolled out its tariff plan. The plan has caused market turmoil. I'm not going to go into the details of the plan, as these have been well documented in the media.

We have received questions regarding any portfolio actions we are taking in response. The short answer, for now, is none. There is a vacuum of information of what the tariffs will entail and how long they will last. Acting on what was announced, in my opinion, amounts to speculation rather than investing. We simply don't know, nor do we have any probabilistic sense of the outcome. Furthermore, market volatility has been very high. We know from past analysis that our investment decisions in high volatility markets have had low hit rates.

Our consumer investments have been impacted significantly by the threat of tariffs and the tariff announcement. Consumer discretionary has been one of our worst performing sectors on a year-to-date basis. However, it is also one of the areas where we see potential valuation discrepancies and upside. In our underperforming strategies this year, the consumer sector has been a significant drag.

Regarding the tariffs themselves, we foresee several potential scenarios. This is by no means an exhaustive list but provides a range of outcomes that illustrate why we believe reacting now would be speculative.

Worst case scenario: The announced tariffs persist, even into the next administration as the Trump 1.0 tariffs did. In this scenario, we believe globalization would effectively end. The era of globalization witnessed a significant rise in returns on invested capital (ROIC) and free cashflow (FCF) margins. In some areas of the market, this resulted in multiple expansion and increased stock prices. Rolling back ROIC and FCF margins would possibly result in multiple contraction and significant stock price declines. How much? We don't know but likely much more than what we have experienced so far.

Best case scenario: The Trump administration changes its mind and removes the tariffs. We see this as unlikely.

Second best scenario: Countries come to the table to negotiate and/or the courts rule against the tariffs and they are subsequently removed. The timeline for this scenario is indeterminate.

If we go with the second best scenario, there will be a time lag before clarity emerges. We don't believe that rational managements will make long-term investment decisions in a period of uncertainty. We also don't think they will make significant investment decisions based on the policy of a final term president. Therefore, we think the most likely outcome is an air pocket in economic activity as marketplace participants wait to see what the rules of the game are. This could, or could not, lead to recession.

In short, we don't know. Current price movements, in our opinion, contain no meaningful information. We will continuously reassess the tariff situation and its potential impact on our companies but will not speculate on outcomes. Instead, we will look for opportunities where the worst-case scenario is nearly priced in. If such opportunities arise, we will aggressively pursue value. While we haven't reached that point yet, we continue to monitor developments closely.

U.S. equity markets slumped in March amid renewed concern and uncertainty surrounding President Trump's tariff plans. The Russell 2000 Value Index, down 6.0%, slightly underperformed the S&P 500 (-5.6%) and outperformed the tech heavy Nasdaq 100 (-7.6%). For the month, value outperformed growth across all four of our benchmarks. Our small cap value and micro cap strategies outperformed their respective benchmarks, while small/mid cap value and mid cap value underperformed.

Each representative account serves as the model against which all accounts in each respective strategy are managed. The representative accounts are actual portfolios and the information provided, including performance, will vary for other accounts. The representative accounts are being used solely as tools to help demonstrate how performance can be attributed to the investment policies applied in the management of each strategy.

Net-of fees returns reflect gross performance less investment management fees, which are calculated by deducting 1/12 of the highest tier of the standard fee schedule in effect for the period noted (the model fee). The composite model fee for each period is either the highest tier of the current fee schedule or a higher value, whichever is required to ensure the model composite net-of-fee return is lower than or equal to the composite net-of-fee return calculated using actual fees. Actual fees may vary depending on, among other things, the applicable fee schedule and portfolio size. The firm's fees are available on request and may be found in Part 2A of its Form ADV.
